What is the difference between high resolution and low resolution images?

Digital images are made up square dots called pixels. Each pixel represents the color of a small part of an image. The more pixels you have in an image the smoother and more realistic the image will appear. High resolution images have many more pixels. Our publications get printed out on high resolution, 300dpi (dots per inch, or pixels per inch). By providing a low resolution image, you wont get the proper outcome.

For example: If you provide us with:

This image is only 72 dpi, taken from somones website at actual size.

This is how small the image will be once it is made into high resolution and printed in the magazine.
